Diversity Employment Source

A newsletter to educate and inform HR Managers in the greater Los Angeles area.

Retention: in house recruiting How to keep your best employees?

If you really do believe that your employees are your greatest assets, you have an obligation to identify their area of greatest contribution and put it to work for your company.

You can't change other people, but if you get interested in them, and what they have to offer, they will shine and become the greatest assets of the company. How does it feel when someone is deeply interested in you without an ulterior motive? It feels great! right? Why not give that gift to your employees and identify each individual's area of greatest contribution and then look for opportunities to put it to work?

Everyone has fulfilling moments on the job and everyone has intolerances; things that make them react on the job. Next time you have a problem with an employee ask yourself this question? "What does this person contribute naturally (without having to change)? When employees are resentful their conversation and contributions reflect it but these resentments actually are hiding commitment that can be put to use for the good of the company. Think about it, would they bother being angry if they weren't committed to something? Isn't it true that every time you have been angry it has been because you were committed to something that was not happening? If you identify these things for individuals in the workplace, they will naturally become more productive and profitable on the job.

For companies that really want to provide an environment where people grow and contribute in a greater way, we must learn to identify each individual's greatest areas of contribution and put it to work, because if you don't it will work against you. Don't forget about evolution; what made an employee happy on the job two years ago may no longer be sufficient. When was the last time you surveyed your employees to find out the contribution they most want to make? If you haven't done this recently and you're looking for tools come to the Diversity Employment Source presentation by Greg Moores on Employee Retention. Greg was a former recruiter for Intel, Corporation.
